

Happy New Year!

My apologies for the hiatus in holiday highlights. Let's start with excellent news. The beloved kids and I are well. Ad is a sophomore at Boston University, double-majoring in Fine Arts and Computer Science. Within those very large and different areas, currently subareas of focus are sculpture and robotics. It has been so long since I last sent out a holiday update that I feel I should include this high school graduation photo for Addie.

Amelia is a sophomore, symmetrically enough, in high school. Her interests are Debate Club, Science Olympiad, Marching Band (mellophonium), Band (euphonium) and Jazz Band (trombone). Ad is nineteen now; and has noted that this was kind of a boring birthday, not monumental, because you get nothing out of it. Amelia turns sixteen this year but alas the Wise Leadership of Indiana (I hope you were not drinking coffee when you read that phrase, if so sorry about the burned nose hairs) has decided you do not actually get to drive until you are sixteen and a half.

The cats are also well. In the divorce I received Twilight and Oval; Shaun took Midnight and Lady What Trouble of Upto Next? (The question mark is part of her name, but we just call her, "What" for short.) After about a year What migrated to my house based on the universal consensus so rare in such splits, where she is as settled with Twilight and Oval now as she was before the split. Ziggy is now and has always been mine.

Another hiatus was diving, but in 2013 I took up my sporadic, usually annual practice of diving. Here is a cool picture that you cannot in any way tell is actually me but I promise it is. Obviously this is me because no one would post a photo with their arm sticking out like this if it were not for authenticity.

There was zero break on the practice of going to the beach every year. That is full on. We have been moving around beach houses. Of course, we miss Lizzie horribly each year. Elizabeth Lane Hoffman (1992-2011) always found my efforts at organization appropriately humorous, but now I have to take the responsibility of laughing at myself. I do have Ad and Mia to help with that part, of course. Of course, we miss my Dad too. (Dad, Mia, Cousin Julia, Addie, Lizzie and Mom from left to right.)

2011 was a sad year. But Liz and Dad were awesome, and their memories are a blessing. Here they are on a happy day, to make you smile, for both were much-loved. I miss them.

Back to the quotidian, work is going well.

My radical ideas of the nineties and naughts that security is inherently human as well as technical have gone from being silly buggers to obvious truth, as these things sometimes do. It is good to be right. Now if we (as an industry and community) can just figure out that privacy matters too when people make decisions, I will be euphoric in my validation.

Despite my use of the i-word (industry) in the previous paragraph, I am still a dyed-in-the-wool faculty member. I will note that if you look at the 2014 Microsoft Cat Calendar in March; however, you will find What. This is because she is living up to her name not because I have doodle to do with the evil empire. Well, I suppose Apple is now the evil empire what with the tax evasion and slavery. Or is it Google, since it is Tuesday? Some days I do not entirely keep up. However, probably around 2010 I was promoted to Full Professor, no adjectives for my professorship!

Amelia and I as pirates look good, but Nathan looks AWESOME! Yes, we met him irl. Addie looks pretty awesome too. My tattoo says, "Liz", my sister got a matching one

I had much travel for work and a few for fun in the past three years. The most recent is Tokyo but I did not take any good pictures. I speak no Japanese so I mostly ordered by pointing at collections of characters on what I am very sure were indeed menus, and hoping on two occasions that the patient people to whom I was speaking understood the word, "chicken". On one of those occasions that was the case. On the other I got some excellent noodles. Above is a picture of me hiking in Nepal. That trip was in 2011 and awesome.

Mostly we just hang out as shown left. No, Amelia does not have three hands. This is just cropped but it is the most recent picture. She does have very anime blue hair, that is accurate. Again, my apologies for the break in news. All is well. I wish the best for you and yours.
